Petunia hurried away and Bugs strolled into the house. He found Cicero, sitting on the floor, playing with a small electric train.

"Oh, it's YOU!" Cicero scowled in greeting when he saw Bugs.

"Yes, it's me," Bugs replied cheerfully. "I've come to play with you, Cicero, li'l chum. Where did you get that super train?"

"For Christmas," Cicero answered briefly. "You can watch me while I run it. But don't touch it!"

"All right," Bugs agreed with such surprising good humor that even little Cicero looked at him in bewildered wonder.

Bugs sat on the floor. Cicero pushed the switch. The little engine, with its two coaches, sped around the tracks. Faster and faster it went and Cicero shouted with glee.

BUGS MAKES TWO RESOLUTIONS

"Hey! Better slow up!" Bugs exclaimed. "It'll jump the track!"

"Oh, no it won't! I'm runnin' this train an' I'm goin' to make it go as fast as it can!" Cicero pushed the speed lever to its highest notch.

Round and round the little train careened. Finally it leaped off the track and hurtled across the floor, leaving a trail of scratches behind it as it headed for the wall.

Bugs lurched to grab it, and bumped into a slender-legged table on which stood a lamp and a bowl of flowers. Table, lamp, and bowl crashed to the floor in a shower of water and broken glass. At that same moment the engine thudded into the wall and came to a stop.

"Now see what you've done!" Cicero wailed, as he pulled the engine out of the hole it had made in the wall. "You'd better get busy an' clean up that mess before Petunia gets home."

Bugs started to speak. Then he gritted his teeth and turned toward the kitchen. A moment later he reappeared, carrying a broom, mop, and dustpan. He didn't see the little wagon which Cicero quickly and silently had pushed across the doorway.

Bugs uttered a startled yelp as one foot stepped on the wagon and it slid out from under him.

"Yipe!!" he cried, staggering wildly into the room, trying frantically to regain his balance.

He grabbed the edge of the window draperies. With a RIP the draperies tore loose from the pole. The broom handle crashed through the window pane. Then Bugs, wagon, draperies, broom, mop, and dustpan landed in a tangled heap on the floor. While, above the thud of the fall and the tinkle of broken glass, sounded the shrill laughter of Cicero.

When Petunia returned a few minutes later, she stood, frozen, in the doorway, too startled to speak. A red-faced, howling Cicero was sitting in a big chair. He was tied securely so that he couldn't move. A grim-faced Bugs was busily cleaning up the room.

"Why—what . . ." Petunia gasped. "I thought you'd made a resolution . ."

"I did," Bugs said gruffly. "An' I kept it. But I also made ANOTHER one! And that is . . NEVER to take care of Cicero Pig again!"
